East of Malta, West of Suez-Great Britain. Admiralty 2001 This book covers the naval battles in the Eastern Mediterranean in1940 and 1941, as the British Navy was called to defend the armies serving in the region from attack by the forces of Italy and Germany. Originally published in 1943, this account contains fascinating air reconnaissance photographs of the fleets and naval encounters. In an operation covering a Malta convoy at the end of June our cruisers sighted three enemy destroyers of Cape Matapan. They sank one at long range as they fled westward in the failing light. The destroyer Dainty and her flotilla ran into a number of Italian submarines off Crete and disposed of three in quick succession. A flying boat accounted for the fourth and probably the fifth. It was like stamping on a viper's nest.

Annual Year Book- 1899

John Galsworthy-Hermon Ould 1935 A tribute to Galsworthy, written soon after his death, by an admirer who had worked with him in PEN, the international writers' association. Not a biography or an objective critical analysis, this is a series of loosely linked essays on aspects of Galsworthy's life and work. There are some (but not very many) personal anecdotes, and interesting material on the early years of PEN and Galsworthy's struggle to keep the organisation non-political. The book (and the fact that it went into a second edition within a year) shows the high regard in which Galsworthy was held at the time of his death; as much attention is given to his plays as to his novels.
